Overview of the Game's Context and Objectives

Before delving into the rules, it's essential to understand the game's context. France 1940 simulates the rapid German offensive through the Ardennes, the assault on the Maginot Line, and the subsequent encirclement of Allied forces. Its aim is to recreate the strategic dilemma faced by both sides: the Germans' blitzkrieg tactics versus the French and Allied defensive strategies.

The rules govern:

- Unit types and capabilities
- Movement and terrain effects
- Combat resolution
- Supply and logistics
- Special rules for air support and fortifications

These elements work together to produce a simulation that demands careful planning and adaptability.

Core Components of the Ruleset

The rules of Avalon Hill France 1940 are divided into several interconnected sections, each addressing a different aspect of gameplay. Let's explore these in detail.

- Units and Armies

The game features various unit types, each with specific characteristics:

- Infantry Divisions: Basic ground units with moderate movement and attack capabilities.
- Panzer Divisions: Mobile armored units with higher attack strength and movement.
- Fortified Units: Defenses along the Maginot Line, with special rules for assault resistance.
- Air Units: Fighters, bombers, and reconnaissance aircraft, each with their own rules for movement, combat, and support.

Rules Highlight:

- Units have strength points, which determine their combat effectiveness.
- Morale influences their ability to fight and withdraw.
- Stacking limits restrict the number of units in a single hex, affecting how formations maneuver.

- Map and Terrain

The map is detailed, featuring:

- Hexagonal grid representing the Western Front.
- Terrain types such as forests, rivers, urban areas, and mountains.
- Special features like the Maginot Line and Ardennes forests.

Rules Highlight:

- Terrain affects movement costs and combat modifiers.

- For example, forests slow units and provide defensive bonuses, while rivers hinder movement unless bridged or ferried.

- Movement Rules

Movement is a core mechanic, simulating the mobility of units during fast-paced operations.

Key points include:

- Movement Points (MP): Each unit has a set MP per turn, modified by terrain.
- Overrun and Flanking: Certain units can perform overruns, moving through enemy-occupied hexes under specific conditions.
- Supply Lines: Movement is constrained by supply availability; units out of supply may suffer penalties.

Rules Highlight:

- Panzers have higher MP, emphasizing their speed.
- Mountainous terrains significantly reduce movement, encouraging strategic planning.

- Combat System

The combat rules are intricate, balancing chance and strategy.

Core mechanics:

- Attack and Defense Values: Units' strength points and terrain modifiers influence combat outcomes.
- Combat Resolution: Typically, players roll dice (often a 2d6 or similar system) with modifiers based on units, terrain, and support.
- Air Support: Air units can provide reconnaissance, attack ground targets, or defend against enemy aircraft, affecting combat odds.

Special Combat Rules:

- Encirclements: Players can attempt to encircle enemy units, making them more vulnerable.
- Fortified Positions: Maginot Line units resist assault better, requiring specific strategies to breach.

- Supply and Logistics

Supply lines are vital for maintaining offensive momentum.

Rules include:

- Supply Hexes: Units must be within a certain range of supply sources.
- Supply Interruptions: Enemy actions or terrain can disrupt supply, leading to penalties like reduced combat effectiveness or forced withdrawals.
- Supply Consumption: Units consume supply points each turn, emphasizing the importance of logistics.

Air units are pivotal, providing reconnaissance, close air support, and interdiction.

Rules cover:

- Air Movement: Limited by range and weather conditions.
